SOUND OFF

Q: When you list a property, what are the three major things that influence how you price the home?

A: Location, location, location. That's the one thing about real estate that can't be changed and is, therefore, the most important factor. The home's condition, however, can be changed, and I usually help the seller weigh which improvements will bring an increase in sales price above what is spent.

Comparable sales are important, too. The buyer will also be looking at these in deciding what to offer for the home. Comps tell us about what values are in the current. local market.

You also have to factor in what neighborhood a home is in and its size. Timing is important, too, especially in a changing market. We used to look at six months' worth of comps, but now, it's smarter to stay closer to three months. I typically try to price the property within about 5 percent of what I believe it will sell for, but not lower than what the seller will accept.
